Implantable cardioverter defibrillators (ICDs) are medical devices to be used to treat patients suffering from a life-threatening condition known as atrial or ventricular fibrillation. These are disorders in which an abnormal and rapid rhythm occurs in the heart, thereby disrupting the heart's normal rhythm. During atrial or ventricular fibrillation, the patient may suffer multiple strokes without ever regaining consciousness, a condition called cardiogenic shock. Because of this, ICDs are typically surgically implanted in the patient at a relatively young age. ICD
