Their efforts this week to rally public support for any semblance of an executive order and even a legislative solution for DACA, even though it involves a vast overhaul of the country's legal immigration system, has been a disaster, not only from a messaging standpoint, but from an execution standpoint. Meghan McCain, who was McCain in the early days of the administration, said over the weekend that one of the top priorities of the GOP is to work with Congress. More from McCain: I have worked with [Sen. Chuck] Grassley, on both the judiciary and taxes, in a professional way. I think that this is not a professional way. This is a chaotic way to govern and I think that is why it has been so destructive, not only to people in my state, but to the way people throughout the country think about and relate to government. That's not just a smart assessment of the missteps that the administration has made over the past week, it's the way it's playing out, over and over again: Trump attacks the news media, the media then comes back and slaps the president in the face. A Washington Post/ABC News poll last week found that 53 percent
